INTRODUCTION WOODSTOCK. r l HE busy period of the great Civil War was one in which the character arid g o enius of dif ferent parties were most brilliantly displayed, and, accordingly, the incidents which took place on either side were of a striking and extraordinary character, and afforded ample foundation for fictitious composition. The author had in some measure attempted such in Peveril of the Peak but the scene was in a remote part of the kingdom, and mingled with other national differences, which left him still at liberty to glean another harvest out of so ample a store. IV INTRODUCTION TO In these circumstances, some wonderful ad ventures winch happened at Woodstock in the year 1049, occurred to him as something he had lone ago read of, although he was unahle to tell where, and of which the hint appeared sufficient, although, doubtless, it might have been much better handled if the author had not, in the lapse of time, lost every thing like an accurate recollection of the real story. It was not until about this period, namely, 1831, that the author, hcingscallcd upon to write this Introduction, obtained a general account of what really happened upon the marvellous occasion in question, in a work termed The Every-day Book published by Mr Hone, and full of curious antiquarian research, the object being to give a variety of original information concerning manners, illustrated by curious in stances, rarely to be found elsewhere. Among other matter, Mr Hone quotes an article from the British Magazine for 1747, in the following words, and which is probably the document whicli the author of Woodstock had formerly perused, although he wan unable to refer...
